question: "Can chloroform be used to manufacture robbery?" arrives at the same purely negative conclusion as which we started some time since on the occasion of the Torp's trial. The length of time necessary to produce insensibility, the turbulence of the persons operated on during the first and second stages, their involuntary struggles and tendency to sing, and about, all add largely to the dangers of the thief who attempts to use it, instead of in any way to assist him. No man, therefore, can afford to run the risk of chloroform can doubt that the two agents, whose effects have been in such cases mistaken for those of chloroform, are drink and fear.
